About the Conference

The Faculty of Social Science at the University of Rajshahi, Bangladesh, is pleased to announce its forthcoming International Conference on Building Inclusive Futures: Society, Development and Governance in the 21st Century. In a fast-changing world, this timely conference provides an interdisciplinary stage for academics, researchers, development practitioners, legislators, civil society actors, and others to engage in essential debates on social inclusion, equity, and sustainability. Climate change and environmental degradation, pandemics, technological disruptions, socioeconomic disparities, demographic changes, and global political change define the 21st century. In this multifaceted environment, "inclusivity" seems to be an ethical and strategic necessity rather than only a developmental objective.

This conference seeks to discuss and emphasise how inclusive futures might be envisioned and realised in the changing context of the 21st century. It will explore how development strategies, government structures, cultural contexts, and social frameworks could be more sensitive to marginal peoples' needs. It will also examine the prospects and challenges of developing inclusive organisations, promoting social justice, and ensuring participatory decision-making in the context of existing disparities.

The conference themes are well-reflected in the several interdisciplinary orientations of the Faculty of Social Science. The event will produce whole insights and promote interdisciplinary discussions on how inclusive futures can be built across many social, cultural, political, and economic settings employing the convergence of these disciplines. Participants can present original research, exchange practical experiences, participate in policy discussions, and build networks with colleagues.

Keynote addresses by famous academics, plenary sessions, paper presentations, and thematic panel discussions will all be part of the conference. The conference aims to generate actionable knowledge to create more inclusive, resilient, and just societies in Bangladesh, across the Global South and beyond.

Within the broad framework of society, development, and governance, we welcome papers providing theoretical reflections, empirical analyses, comparative case studies, or creative policy solutions. We especially welcome contributions from academics, development practitioners, early career researchers, and students.
